Potential Quality - Curiosity

I recently read an interesting thread on social media, which listed the characteristics of successful people. Although it is not a stereotype, but one of the characteristics of these people which amazed me was their “curiosity”. This characteristic drives them forward, improving, achieving and climbing upwards step by step all the time.

Being raised in an Asian traditional family, I first felt it difficult to understand that. I couldn't link the curious nature of a person with his success.

In China, we were often reminded by our parents of this proverb:

“Both ears are shut to what goes on outside the window; the whole mind is concentrated on the sage's book. That meant we must focus on study or the work we did. We should not take interest in any other fields. If someone had too many interests outside these two areas, parents, or other people, would regard him as going to achieve nothing. That culture is completely opposite to that character discussed above. Interestingly, when a new member joined the service, if we wrote “curiosity” in the profile, if that person happens to be Chinese, she/he would feel offended. They simply don't like this word.

Let's think this: without curiosity, what our society, or life will be. I guess there will be no new thoughts, new discoveries, new developments, no new improvements, no desire to have a better life.

Curiosity is the reason for people to learn more, to improve more and to have a better life. The more curious a person is, the more he will learn. The more he learns, the more he can apply in his life. The more he applies in his life, the more chance that he can achieve. Certainly his life will be more interesting. Talking to a curious person, the conversation will never be bored.

Not just at work, or in life, curiosity also drives good communication in relationship or marriage, which along with other reasons to make it successful.

For example, curious people usually take a strong interest in learning, including learning about their partners.

They like to know more about their partners. They take interests in partners' personality, interests, goals, desires and needs. Therefore they listen, they watch and they think.

Their interest in the partners and the attention given to the partners are the affirmation of love, respect and encouragement to the partners.

Many people complain that their partners did not give them enough attention, or didn't have an interest in learning and listening about them. Perhaps this is because the partners are not so curious about them, and their lives. This lack of curiosity often makes people feel unloved, vulnerable and lonely. Just think this: if our partners do not feel curious about us, or take interests of our needs, what kind of value does the relationship have?

Curiosity is also the reason for people to improve, to fit in and to change. Curious people are more willing to try different things, no matter it is foods, languages, culture, interests, or mixing with different friends. While trying, they understand and accept differences. Doing these things is not just because they love the partners, also because they are just naturally curious. Naturally they have the desire to improve.

Curiosity also drives chemistry between two people. Nothing can be more exciting than two people constantly learning from and about each other, sharing interests with one another and improving together. It is stimulating. By doing that, the chemistry will never die.

Curiosity comes from the nature of a person. This characteristic brings so much potential to any achievement, including work, study, career, or marriage. Therefore I encourage people to recognize this potential from the partner. At the same time, I also encourage people being curious about life and about your partner. There are lots to learn, lots to discover and lots to achieve.
