CASE STUDY

Shirley is a middle age Chinese woman. In China she used to hold a high position in a government department. Unfortunately her husband had an affair behind her back, which destructed her career and hurt her deeply. She decided to leave that environment and come to Australia with her son.

Being encouraged by friends, Shirley walked into my office. We talked for nearly 2 hours. She was an interesting woman, having been to many countries and places in the world. She also had experience of dealing people from all background and levels. Talking about a future partner, Shirley was very reasonable. However after a while, every date ended up pleasantly, but no one asked her out again. Obviously she was discouraged. But what went wrong?

At a casual gathering, I talked to a man who had met Shirley. He told me Shirley was a nice woman, but a little too old. To my surprise this man was 10 years Shirley's senior. Until one day when Shirley came to our party, I suddenly realised what this man was talking about.

The parties we organise are to encourage our members to meet and get to know each other. For this theme, people usually dress nicely. They like to impress people. But Shirley didn't seem to understand that need. She walked in to the party, wearing a big down coat. Her long skirt covered her feet. Under the skirt, there were a pair of sport shoes. It is hard to work out whether she had just finished shopping, or walking. Definitely this kind of dress didn't fit well for a singles party. Her age wasn't old, but her dress style was made her look old fashion.

I suggested to her that coming to singles party, she might need to consider light make-up and a smart dress, she told me she didn't want to impress people by her looks, or dress. She wanted people to know her as a person. She wasn't wrong in many ways. We all hope people like us for who we are, instead of what we look like or what we have. But at the same time, we also need to understand human nature.

When it comes to relationships, human nature is visual, sometimes shallow, men particularly. If visually they are not attracted, few people will get excited. That is because they don't know the person. There is no emotional attachment. People only ignore the appearance after they get to know someone, or when they are emotionally involved with someone. Therefore with the intention to enter into a new relationship, people should create the opportunity for others to take interest in them, so they can get to know each other, while a good presentation is an important part of that opportunity.

We also need to understand this is the 21st century, which is very different from China in 50's and 60's when good appearance was a crime. People nowadays are more educated and have more wisdom. Their expectation for an idea partner is not merely a kind person, but also a person who is intelligent enough to present herself/himself properly. The presentation needs to match the time and the society in which we live.

I understand Shirley was running a very busy life. Both her family and her work needed her. She didn't have enough time to study fashion. But if she could understand the relationship and peoples' expectation, she could do something to improve. For instance she could pay attention to people around her and people in the street about their dresses. She could also pay attention to the window displays of clothing shops. She could get lot of tips from there. Actually she herself didn't like men who had poor sense of dress.

I often think about the presentation of a product. If there is no attractive packaging, there won't be many people buy it. It is similar, if it is not exactly the same, that we need to create that packaging of ourselves for people to know our inside.
