CASE STUDY

A few weeks ago, Matthew rang me. He sounded very discouraged by his recent dating experiences. He lost confidence that he could find someone or anyone would like him.

Matthew recently joined the service. After the interview, I felt quite confident to help him. I believe many women would like Matthew, because he was well-presented, and honest. He also had a stable job. He should be the ideal husband for many women..

Matthew used to have a long term relationship. In that relationship, he gave everything. Not only providing his partner with lovely gifts and holidays, he also looked after many domestic work, including cooking and cleaning. Whenever his partner was upset, he always tried to understand the situation, and compromise. His giving and tolerance was treated as “ this is meant to be”. It became worse and worse till one day he couldn’t take the situation anymore.

Physically he ended the relationship, but emotionally he still held the bitter and angry feeling. Whenever he met a new date, he never forgot to tell his long and bitter story. He thought it was honest.

After talking to a few ladies Matthew took out, I realised his honesty and openness at the first date didn’t receive fair judgement from the women. One woman told me after hearing Matthew’s story, she really felt sorry for him. But at the same time, it also discouraged her about relationship. She didn’t want to meet someone who behaved like Mathew’s last partner.

Another woman told me Matthew’s story made her think maybe Matthew also had problem, because when a relationship fails, the problem usually lies between both partners, not just one.

Another woman even laughed at his story. She said it looked like Matthew was not very intelligent.

I suggested to Matthew that he should hold his story until he knew the lady a little better . But he said he wanted to be honest.

I have met quite a few people who are like Matthew. They have good intentions, to get people to know them. But technically they made a mistake by telling their negative stories too much and too soon .

I am not suggesting that people should lie, or be dishonest. lying and dishonesty are different from keeping privacy . We all have some experience in relationships. These personal experiences is to help us grow emotionally. We don’t need other people’s comments, or sympathy.

Telling our story too early and too much can create the following negativities:

1. Killing the chemistry. Once we sink into a negative mood, no one can feel romantic;
2. Attracting negative response. A human being is negative orientated. Any negative emotion, including anger, bitterness, complaints can attract unfair judgement.
3. Holding you back from moving on. If we keep talking about the past, our mind and heart will remain in the past. Therefore we can never move on to have a new life.
